What is Sensory Processing?
Throughout our everyday activities our brain is provided with information from our 7 senses.

Our brain receives this information, processes it, and uses what we require to function and remain appropriately calm and alert.

In those with sensory processing differences, the brain is unable to clearly register and process this information which impacts on functional ability. The brain may place too much or too little importance on the information causing a person to receive too much or too little of that sensation.

We all have some sensory processing differences that are often our quirks such as not liking certain textures of foods, needing to cut labels out of clothes, heightened sense of smell or not liking busy and noisy environments. However, it is the level of these problems and the impact that they have on our ability to function with essential everyday tasks or activities that determines a sensory processing difficulty.

Our Service Offer
Our Occupational Therapy team will accept referrals that detail barriers to function including everyday tasks and activities. At the session with the Occupational Therapist we will discuss the difficulties with sensory processing the child is facing. Our service offers advice and recommendations only. It is very much a team based approach and draws upon the partnership between parents, the child, and school staff.
